Californian Pharaoh: A collective memoir. The memory was still present, its images fresh from the vortex of life, still brimming with static energy waiting to be extinguished by dementia. The air was stale, I inhaled deeply. I remembered the agents own words: left button will signal the agent to assassinate Fidel Castro. Right button will signal our man to take you out. All right, its done. Are you sure you want to do this Mr. President? a woman asked. Ill just reincarnate someplace else, I said. ... Then the car moved by the Secret Service man, who I waved down from the aisle. My right hand gripped the remote device in my jacket pocket. I pressed the left button; it was stuck. This was typical of the CIA technology. So I pressed the right one. Of course, that one worked. Its always the right one, I thought to myself. The car neared the clearing. A faint memory lingered: You cant say Texas doesnt love you, Mr. President. Two shots fired. One hit my neck from behind. I urged my wife, Jackie, closer; I wanted to tell her something important. Then the second one hit my head; it felt like a Stroke. Then my body became limp as I broke free from my prison of flesh and blood. . . I floated up into the air, not looking back...
