Excerpt from An Address Introductory to a Course of Lectures, at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York: Session of 1850 51; Thursday, November 7, 1850

Gentlemen: Before I proceed to deliver the remarks introductory to the few lectures which I am to deliver to you, I cannot refrain from expressing the satisfaction I feel in once again addressing the class of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, as one of its Professors, nor from acknowledging the kindness of my present Colleagues, of the Trustees and Regents, who have so willingly conferred upon me the rank which enables me to assume the responsible duty of instructing you. A considerable period of time has elapsed since my last connection with its Faculty ceased; and if, during that time, I have been placed in the position of an opponent to its success, believe me to be candid in saying that I have witnessed its successful struggles against powerful competition with pleasure, and with all the interest and enthusiasm of an Alumnus, for such, almost, I am, have marked its gradual progress in usefulness, and in the esteem and favor of the profession. Among its Professors and Trustees are many of my oldest and most valued friends and pupils, and I should be callous to the best feelings of our nature, could I reflect upon my past connection with this School, and not rejoice in its prosperity, or feel pleasure in my re-association with its interests and occupations.
