

One Nurses View: The Workplace and Bodies of Oversight

If you like Extensive training and Oversight, then nursing may be for you. It always engenders a feeling of security when Big Brother is watching over you. Following that logic then Multiple big brothers means multiplied security. Right? Join me on a whimsical trip to explore all the unofficial bosses that eat into the time we should be taking care of you. Now I realize that each workplace is a little different, depending on the specialty or focus. And each profession has its own special area of expertise which requires special skills and competencies. All places of work have policies and procedures for completing the job at hand. It just seems like Nursing takes this, like everything, to mean a holistic view; often to the extreme. We struggle to do the job we were trained to do, all while trying not to get bogged down in all the rules, regulations and paperwork imposed from outside. What is oversight? Most frequently the general population has heard this term as it relates to government oversight committees in DC. In the field of nursing, it comes from both internal and external sources. These include facility and departmental requirements, as well as state and federal governmental and other agencies that provide managing and control of the profession. One would think that once you passed all your classes in school, including actual hands-on in Clinicals, and obtained a college degree you would be good to go. Yet you must satisfy the first oversight agency before you can actually work, the State Boards of Nursing. Now you can apply for a job. You fill out the lengthy application and are screened and panel interviewed. If hired, you go through a probationary period. Now you learn more about internal and other external sources of oversight. Internal Oversight are those facility and department Policies and Procedures and Committees that strive to keep all external oversight agencies happy. Competencies assessments are one way, a big time-eater. One year I was harried with the additional workload of checking off everyones annual competencies. I had 45 to check off on each staff member; my friend who works at NASA found this amazingly humorous, seems he only has 2 annual competencies and one of these is a physical. Seems they appreciate that he passed all the requirements to be what he is, and believe that since he is doing the job that he must still be competent, unless there is evidence to the contrary. I like the sound of that, more so every year. External Oversight includes state and federal agencies and other oversight bodies that require accountings to be made. These include the AHA, ANCC, CMS, FDA, AHRQ, CDC and OSHA; which is one of my personal favorites. Who knew the Material Safety Data Sheets could be so helpful. Yet the most pervasive are the Health care Accrediting Agencies. JCAHO I really like you. Nursing Professional Oversight, you have to love those overseeing bodies that aim to make sure we are doing everything right, what would the workplace be without them. Always so helpful pointing out flaws and adding to our workload. Now lets see, patient care or paperwork, hmmm. Gotta run for now. Stay well or Ill see you soon,
