

Exploring The Digital Nation: Americas Emerging Online Experience

Researchers and policymakers recognize that availability and use of high-speed Internet services a range of connection technologies collectively known as broadband are essential to economic growth. The United States has made considerable progress towards ubiquitous broadband access, with more than 93 percent of the population living in areas offering wired broadband service, and about 98 percent having access to either wired or terrestrial wireless connectivity at speeds of at least 3 Mbps download and 768 Kbps upload (NTIA & FCC, 2013). The Internet has rapidly grown from an academic network into a resource that is now integral to the lives of most Americans. In 2000, only 4 percent of homes used broadband Internet service. By 2011, 69 percent were online at speeds greater than dial-up. The President has observed, however, that we have more work to do. For the first time in eight years, this study goes beyond new findings on computer and Internet adoption in the United States to also present data on Americans online activities what Americans do once they connect to the Internet. The dataset contains information collected from more than 53,000 households, reporting on what Americans do online including enjoying entertainment, communicating with friends, job searching and training, and researching health conditions and care, among other activities.
