Excerpt from Address by Chauncey B. Ripley: On the Presentation of the Memorial Portrait of John Norton Pomeroy, LL. D. To the Council of the University of the City of New York

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Council of the University of the City of New York: You have done well to assign a place in the Portrait Gallery of this University to the likeness of Professor Pomeroy. John Norton Pomeroy was a child of genius. The walls of the Chancellors Room are already well-nigh covered with the paintings of familiar faces - faces of men who have here and elsewhere distinguished themselves in the various departments of Art, of Science and of Letters. These portraits are suspended here as memorials of the persons they represent, the esteem in which they are held by the alumni, the officers, the patrons and friends of this institution of learning. You, gentlemen, who to-day constitute the Council, and by whose invitation I am here present bearing a fresh memorial, may well be proud of the men whose features, portrayed by brush and pencil, adorn these walls within which you are accustomed to deliberate. We are justly proud of the virtues, the genius and the achievements of our Frelinghuysen, our Professor Morse and our John W. Draper. It is fit and commendable that the memory of these, and men like these, who in their time have added new lustre to the escutcheon of our University, be perpetuated by memorials of their name and fame. Thus are we continually reminded of the excellence of their character and the usefulness of their lives. Thus are the high standards they heretofore set up for us kept constantly within our view.
